To the Countries' Governments

Engaging in the formation of a new international security system based on a social and solidarity economy

The defining functions of the state are to ensure the security, rights, interests, and freedoms of its citizens. Globalization, mass inclusion, technological innovation, climate change, war and planetary challenges now require a new security system that will ensure national and geocultural sovereignty, the achievement of the Sustainable Development Goals and a viable future. Security built on an economy of arms/disarmament, a system of fear, suffering, and the right of the strongest is now crumbling under the influence of innovation and global inclusion. National security cannot be achieved without solving global problems and ensuring inclusive sustainable development.

The New International Security System is the deployment of a Social and Solidarity Economy.

This is achieved through the creation of a "digital institutional platform" that will provide governments with the regulation, taxation and legal framework for global economic interaction, protect national sovereignty, enhance investment efficiency and create new multipliers of economic development.

And this is not a downgrading of statehood. It is the growing role of the state in the permanent processes of finding sustainable compromises in the interests of its countries in a globalized development format. The cross-border jurisdiction of the "digital institutional platform" will ensure the sovereign management of national policies to securely protect national interests and geo-cultural traditions.

The Sustainable Development Goals and the Social and Solidarity Economy open up a coevolutionary (peaceful and just) format of movement toward a new era of civilizational development. A new international organization, the International Hub for the Management of Sustainable Development Projects, could be the executive body for the realization of this path.

The initiative to establish such an international organization and the process of discussing it means an end to military conflicts, aggression, and terror, which will certainly lead to a constructive movement toward sustainable development, a more just society, and a viable future.

On behalf of the Conference Committee, we invite government representatives to participate in the Constituent International Conference New International Security System – establishment of the International Hub for the Management of Sustainable Development Projects, which aims at creating a new international organization focused on creating a new system of international security, deploying the Social and Solidarity Economy, and implementing the Sustainable Development Goals.
